

Electric Worker Takes 2,300 Volts

2110-32
George Carr, electrical worker, suffered severe burns yesterday morning when he took 2300 volts of electrical current as the result of picking up an electric wire which he thought was not alive at the time.

Working in tunnel lower two, he thought the switch was off and picked up a line from the power source to the electric shovel. He was frozen to the line, until the switch was thrown.

He was rushed by ambulance to the hospital, seriously injured but with good chance at recovery.
