THEY PLANNED IT

Government men living in Las Vegas and Denver planned Boulder City. Now those men who are in the field here are moving into the permanent structures in the community which they visualized while the spot was but barren desert.

Executives and engineers of the department of the interior years ago saw the need for a new town to be built near the scene of dam construction. That town was visualized.

A year and a half ago a party of government surveyors took up its abode in the then new camp in Hemenway wash. Today these men are moving into the permanent dormitory constructed for them in "uptown" Boulder City.

Reclamation officials and employes are moving into completed homes as fast as they are finished. Within less than a month not only will most of the government men be housed in Boulder City, but the offices in the new administration building in Boulder will be functioning, for the direction of the destinies of community and project.
