

EDITORIAL

STIMULATES IMAGINATION

Hear ye:

Once more be it pointed out that the Hoover dam project is one of the greatest stimulators to the popular imagination in the world today.

The figures do not have to be stretched nor the facts warped on this project to give the average imagination a jolt.

News men become so accustomed to huge and unusual Hoover dam stuff on which to feed their typewriters that they need not be even tempted to exaggerate.

One woman visitor, however, recently staggered some of the Hoover dammers by inadvertently pointing out one huge task which had been overlooked, which would be much worth while in making the job even more impressive to the tourist, and which therefore should be given the earnest consideration of government and Six Company men.

Standing at Observation Point looking out over the visible portion of the 100-mile basin where the lake will be impounded, she propounded the casual query:

"Are they going to concrete the bottom of all that lake?"