

Goes to Bootlegging To Assist Daughter

127/32
"I just had to have some extra money to take care of my little girl, and so I took in roomers and started bootlegging," Mrs. Alberta Stanley, wife of a Boulder dam worker told police officers this morning when she was arrested following a raid on her home at 201 South Third street.

Following several complaints lodged at headquarters, the officers secured a search warrant and raided the place, finding a good sized supply of liquor protected by ingenious mechanical devices against unexpected visits from the officers.

They managed to solve the combination, however, and Mrs. Stanley's arrest followed.

She was released on her own recognizance, when she told the officers that her six-year-old daughter had been sick for two weeks and demanded her constant attention. Just what disposition will be made of her case remains to be seen.
