

Boulder City and the Boulder dam reservation are bound to play an important part in the coming election campaign. The opening verbal barrage indicating that this is in store, comes from Reno, where the democrats gathered last week to select a convention city. One prominent democrat charged that "the republicans are making an effort to control the vote at Boulder City by the appointment of scores of deputy United States marshals whose business is to do politics, and they're doing it."

Which may or may not be true. However, it is true, that the republicans, who happen to be the "ins" at the moment, have long since sensed the two or three thousand new votes in the reservation, and are making every possible play to corral the majority thereof. Senator Oddie long since "went Boulder City," realizing how fertile a field it was to work in, and his party cohorts are losing no time in following suit. Regardless of all this, however, Boulder City will work out its own political salvation as it has all else, and when election time rolls around, will be pretty much like any other Nevada community.
