

Any worries (and there have been some rather real ones) those connected with the Boulder dam project might have had concerning the availability of funds to continue the program on schedule have apparently been dissipated by the announcement of high government officials that a $150,000,000 program to "clean up" existing irrigation projects would be given early consideration in the new $3,300,000,000 public works program.

There was no direct Boulder dam appropriation made during the special session of congress, and the available funds would not run much beyond October first, if that far. With congress not scheduled to assemble again until December that left a possible "dead" period of two months with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as the only potential "out."

However, the giant public works program will take care of it now, so we'll have to find something else to worry about.) I forgot I was going to quit worrying and save the few hairs left on top, but anyway, the money is ready, so that's taken care of.
